Brand New Book  Print on Demand .Excerpt from Pioneer Doctors of Brown County, Nebraska The early history of medicine in Brown County, Nebraska, like the early history of the settlement of all new countries, can never be written quite clearly. Too many of the occurrences of that time are forgotten. What would be counted thrilling in this time of good roads and automobiles were just every day occurrences. In the early eighties in Brown county the pioneer doctor was never troubled by the telephone ringing in the night but his rest was often disturbed by someone knocking on his front door and demanding that he make a trip to attend some sick or accidentally injured persons, twenty-five, thirty-five or even fifty miles away. Early settlement in the sand hill country south, and tributary to Ainsworth, Long Pine and Johnstown, were made by stock-men along the streams of water because of the better feed and the easy accessibility of the water for the stock. These streams were the Calamus, 25 miles south, Goose creek 35 miles south, the Bloody 35 miles south and the North Loup 50 miles south. Between these river settlements and the better settled table lands north, lay a vast expanse of sand hills and small valleys, each sand hill, with its blowing top of white sand, looking just like every other sand hill, with only dim trails instead of traveled roads to guide the traveler. In good weather a trip to the nearest settlement south, by hard driving could be made in a day, but to the farther settlements it was an all day and night drive, or, if conditions were bad it meant two nights and a day or,...
